

Alcohol and drug dependency impacts heavily on many individuals and families in our society. It is a disease that can strike virtually anyone and if left untreated, can send lives spiraling downward to hopelessness, despair and in some cases, death.

The L.E. Phillips-Libertas Center and many agencies and institutions of higher education, such as UW-Stout, are dedicated to fighting dependency on alcohol and drugs. The L.E. Phillips-Libertas Center traces its origins to the Hospital Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis, pioneers in treatment of chemical dependency since the 1940s.

That program treats adults, adolescents and families on an inpatient or outpatient basis for dependency on alcohol or drugs and mental health issues. A team of counselors, physicians, occupational counselors, clergy and family therapists work with each patient and family to develop a successful treatment that is uniquely theirs.

The 45-bed L.E. Phillips-Libertas Center is located in a beautiful, peaceful setting offering a comfortable atmosphere in which to recover. Its beneficial connection with St. Joseph's Hospital makes possible the supportive coordination of the physical and emotional aspects of the disease. In addition, the Center offers chemical dependency treatment at the Libertas Center in Green Bay. Outpatient programs are offered in numerous communities in Wisconsin.
